

Here's Why Security Integrators Should Look to Employ More Veterans

Veterans looking to enter the workforce already possess a lot of valuable skills like reliability, trustworthiness, and knowledge of technology.

CE Pro Editors October 10, 2019

Despite what some integrators think, many veterans already understand the language security dealers and installers use, which makes them a good fit for many security jobs.

As CEO of Allied Universal, I believe that veterans, service members and reservists are unsung heroes who serve, secure and care for the people and communities in every corner of our world.

Allied Universal has hired more than 33,000 veterans over the last five years. We appreciate all military personnel and veterans that serve our country and all of our 215,000 employees that protect our communities every day.

5. No Military to Civilian Decoder Needed

Veterans their military skills and how they translate to the general employment landscape. The require that military responsibilities be coded into language that non-military can understand.

Veterans generally enter the workforce with identifiable skills that can be transferred to the physical security world and are often skilled in technical trends pertinent to business making them
receptive and ready hires in physical security environments that value ongoing learning and training.

While some businesses talk the talk about why military veterans are important hires, the physical security sector actually walks the walk. We honor and appreciate the sacrifices every day.

Steve Jones is CEO of Allied Universal, a leading security and facility company in North America that provides security services and technology solutions.
